ANALYSIS

The resolution invites various City officials and agencies to appear before the City Council to discuss the plans and strategies that are being developed to transition Baltimore City employees back to safe physical work environments.

Baltimore City is in the process of restoring 100 percent of resident-facing services, which will require some City employees to return to work onsite. The Restoration of Services Oversight Committee (RSOC) is leading the process and is charged with reviewing agency plans for restoring services, including procedures for staff and resident safety and a staff notification process. It is currently unclear when the City will begin transitioning other employees back to onsite work.
